Tanzanian President John Magufuli denounced imported coronavirus test kits as faulty after he said they returned positive results for samples taken from a goat and a pawpaw, a fruit similar to papaya, Reuters reported on Sunday.

The testing kits had “technical errors,” Magufuli said during an event in Chato in northwestern Tanzania on Sunday. The president added that the coronavirus testing kits had been imported from abroad but did not say from where.

According to the president, these samples were then submitted to a Tanzanian laboratory to test for the coronavirus. Laboratory technicians were not told that these were not human samples.

Samples from the papaya and the goat tested positive for coronavirus, Magufuli said.

He added that this meant it was likely that some people in Tanzania were falsely testing positive for coronavirus.

“There is something happening. I said before we should not accept that every aid is meant to be good for this nation,” the president said. According to the report, Magufuli said he wants the imported testing kits investigated.

In recent weeks, several countries around the world including the United States, Australia, Spain, Turkey, and the Netherlands have rejected coronavirus medical equipment imported from China as defective.

On April 21, Indian health authorities told states to stop using coronavirus testing kits imported from China after a scientific investigation concluded they were wildly inaccurate. This rejection of Chinese-made goods by India was a demonstration of “prejudice” according to the Chinese embassy in New Delhi last week.

“It is unfair and irresponsible for certain individuals to label Chinese products as ‘faulty’ and look at issues with pre-emptive prejudice,” Chinese embassy spokeswoman Ji Rong said in a statement.

Last month, the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) called on the world to “stop smearing Chinese [coronavirus] assistance” in an article published in the state-run newspaper Global Times.

“I think the quality issue reported by some media has been politicized. They can’t prove the reported testing kits have quality issues, because the use and transport [of the kits] may influence their stability and sensitivity,” an employee at Beijing Beier Bioengineering, a test kit provider, told the newspaper.

In Tanzania, Magufuli’s government has drawn criticism in recent weeks for failing to take the coronavirus pandemic seriously. In March, he said Tanzanians need prayer, not medical masks, to protect themselves from the coronavirus.

Tanzania has not taken extensive measures against the coronavirus pandemic yet, unlike most other African nations. Markets, public transportation, and shops remain open in the country, although schools and universities have been closed.

On April 29, a prominent Tanzanian lawyer was arrested for saying the coronavirus was “serious” and “a real threat” to the nation. News of the arrest came amid accusations from a Tanzanian opposition leader that Magufuli’s government was hiding the true number of coronavirus cases and deaths, both believed to be much higher than reported.

At press time on Monday, Tanzania had officially reported 480 infections and 16 deaths from the Chinese coronavirus.

The goat was the 'Village Concubine', and had the most Human Contact with no Social Distancing, so was positive for Corona. And several other diseases.

Did you not read the report? They swabbed a papaya and it came back positive for COVID. Clearly the test is generating false positives.

It should be noted that any test has some risk of false positive and false negative. That's why the FDA validates tests prior to authorizing their use. This takes a lot of time, which is why initial deployment of a test from the CDC was delayed. Trump eventually relaxed those requirements and allowed private labs to develop tests and validate them internally with less oversight from the FDA, which saved weeks of time. It was a good call, and most labs are professional or academic and experts who could be trusted.

But, remember in February, before the private firms were onboard? CDC's tests were faulty. The tests were contaminated. The reagent in their negative control had COVID in it and always came back positive. If the negative control had COVID in it, can we be certain the actual test reagents didn't? The official story is no, but I'm skeptical. Deep State has a long reach and a penchant for blaming unaccountable anonymous lab techs.

Anyway, now the tests have to go through proper FDA validation again, and we're back to our discussion of sensitivity and specificity. Again, some small amount of false results is normal. That's inherent in the chemistry, but not 3 out of 4, which is what Mr. Tanzania is claiming.

You need to have people with enough brains and education to administer the test first. I don't think the Tanzanians have this.

Βασίλης Λαρίσης → Stathanacious1952 • 18 days ago

Why don't they have "this"? Do you believe that their chemists read less books than other chemists worldwide? The less advanced countries if i am allowed to say that have 2 problems and they are: "Braindrain" and less educated people. This leads to lack of scientists. None of this indicates less knowledge on their subject though. By insulting whole countries because of ignorance only makes you embarrassing yourself.

I only know the mindset of the black folks in south Africa who stated in videos I watched of them, that they don't want the white mans math and science. If that is a prevailing mentality in Africa, they've got a problem. Math and science don't belong to the white man. They belong to humanity.
